Myriam Holme's first stainless steel outdoor painting sculpture was created after long preparatory work and a great deal of material research between knowledge, skill and experimentation.

Light and seemingly flying, it is made of weather-resistant stainless steel and high-quality paints and absorbs the changes in nature and its surroundings over the course of the seasons through the reflections and mirroring, but also through formal material curves. The outside world is incorporated into the painting, constantly changing its appearance. It is a play of colours, shapes and the movement of the viewer.

In Greek, 'kosmima' means a piece of jewellery, a jewel, so you could be forgiven for thinking that the giants had lost a piece of jewellery in this private park.
